

Cave-Men of the Trenches

On the right bank of the river Oise, near Noyon, France, there are several caves and chasms so extensive that they can give shelter to a whole regiment of troops. The great arch shown in the photograph to the left has been named by the Germans "Bismarck Rock." Soldiers are shown building a scaffolding in order to place an appropriate inscription over the entrance

An officer's underground home in "The Forest of the Saxons," so called because a regiment of German Saxons are quartered there. Much time and care have apparently been spent in the construction of this bomb-proof, as it is complete to the smallest detail. Below, a realistic picture of the "home life" of the French soldiers in an underground grotto

© Medem Photo Service