

Not Monks, But Camouflaged Artillerymen

The object of camouflage is to deceive the enemy, and the method employed for that purpose necessarily depends upon the conditions and circumstances in each individual case. No hard and fast rules can be laid down and the success of the camouflage depends upon the skill and imaginative power of the officers or men attempting it. The group in the picture with the anti-aircraft gun may not appear sufficiently disguised to deceive a reader, but it is safe to say that, to an observer in an airplane, the group appeared like lichen-covered rocks around a tree-stump
